

Why MCC Matters

As someone who has spent much of his career working at the intersection of education, leadership, strategy, and talent development, I have come to appreciate that institutions are ultimately judged not by political narratives but by the opportunities they create for people.

Over the years, I have observed Mathias Corvinus Collegium develop into an institution that has provided thousands of young people with access to intellectual challenge, mentorship, community, and personal growth. Its greatest contribution is not found in headlines or public debates, but in the students whose horizons have been expanded, whose ambitions have been strengthened, and whose potential has been realised.

What has always stood out to me is MCC's commitment to identifying talent, encouraging excellence, and creating opportunities for individuals from diverse backgrounds to develop their capabilities. In a world where educational institutions increasingly face short-term pressures, it is encouraging to see an organisation that invests in the long-term development of young people and seeks to cultivate both intellectual curiosity and personal responsibility.

As an academic and educator, I believe strongly that societies benefit when they support institutions that foster learning, critical thinking, respectful dialogue, and merit-based advancement. These are values that transcend politics and belong to the broader mission of education itself.

My support for MCC is therefore rooted in its educational mission and its contribution to talent development. I hope that it will continue to provide future generations with opportunities to learn, grow, and contribute meaningfully to their communities and to society at large.

Dr Mark Khater

Head, Centre for Strategy & Performance

Institute for Manufacturing, University of Cambridge

Fellow Benefactor, Queens' College Cambridge